

PROFILE

KAM DRIDI is an independent Montreal-based solo artist working across cinematic melodic hard rock, industrial textures, songwriting, recorded sound, archival material and visual world-building.

The current practice is interested in what happens when an established musical language is treated as material rather than a fixed style: melody can become noise, a familiar riff can become texture, a vocal line can be fragmented, and archival recordings can be reassembled into something that still carries memory while becoming unfamiliar.

CURRENT QUESTIONS

- What survives when a musical tradition is pushed beyond its expected form?
- Can a personal archive become a form of tradition without becoming nostalgia?
- How can hard rock intensity be separated from its usual codes and rebuilt through sound, repetition, interruption and processing?
- How can older recordings and performance habits be treated critically rather than simply reproduced?

SELECTED CURRENT WORK - 2026

ECHOES UNEARTHED

Album project built around rediscovery, buried material and reconstructed musical memory. The project treats older ideas, unfinished fragments and current production as parts of the same artistic timeline.

WAR MACHINES

Cinematic / industrial hard rock work representing the heavier edge of the current practice. It combines direct melodic rock writing with machine-like textures and large-scale production.

OUR LOST DREAMS

A more melodic and emotionally direct work from the same album cycle. It demonstrates the contrast between intimate songwriting and the larger production world around it.

ECHOES UNLIVE IN BRASIL

A developing performance-format project that reworks existing songs into alternate live identities rather than treating the studio version as fixed.

PERSPECTIVE THREE

Developing album project centred on perception, viewpoint, alternate versions and the instability of a single musical reality.

RESEARCH DIRECTION FOR THE LAB

I am interested in treating my own long-running rock practice as a tradition that can be examined, dismantled and resynthesised.

I began making original music in the early 1990s. Instead of presenting that history as nostalgia, I want to ask what happens when its familiar elements - melodic hooks, guitar architecture, vocal phrasing, dramatic structure, studio polish - are pushed toward extremity and then rebuilt.

The next phase I want to explore is a process-based work using:

- archival demos and alternate takes;
- voice before and after production;
- guitar and keyboard material reduced to fragments;
- industrial and non-musical textures;
- repetition, erosion, stretching and filtering;
- live voice against transformed remnants of earlier material.

The difficulty I am currently trying to solve is how to keep the emotional identity of the source while allowing the material to become genuinely unstable and unfamiliar.

The CTM lab would be useful because I want critical feedback on where this approach becomes meaningful research rather than simply a stylistic remix. I also want to learn from artists working with tradition from very different positions, and to test a short solo presentation that makes the transformation process audible.

PRACTICAL FORMAT

Solo artist.

Live voice + prepared and transformed audio.

Compact technical footprint.

15-20 minute presentation can be prepared for the lab.
